The dominant discourse on unemployment often blames the unemployed for their situation. This discourse suggests that the unemployed are lazy, unmotivated, and unwilling to work. It also suggests that the unemployed are responsible for their own unemployment and that they should not expect help from the government or from society.

This discourse is based on a number of false assumptions. First, it assumes that all unemployed people are capable of finding work. This is simply not true. There are many factors that can contribute to unemployment, such as a lack of education, a lack of skills, or a lack of experience. Second, this discourse assumes that all unemployed people are unwilling to work. This is also not true. Most unemployed people want to work and are actively looking for jobs. Third, this discourse assumes that the unemployed are responsible for their own unemployment. This is also not true. As mentioned above, there are many factors that can contribute to unemployment, and often these factors are beyond the control of the unemployed person.

The dominant discourse on unemployment has a number of negative consequences. First, it stigmatizes the unemployed. This can make it difficult for unemployed people to find jobs and to reintegrate into society. Second, this discourse justifies government policies that make it more difficult for the unemployed to receive assistance. Third, this discourse contributes to the poverty and inequality that is associated with unemployment.

A Critical Psychology of Unemployment
